The scene, in the first two acts, is laid in Germany; in the third act, in Italy.

Mignon.

A narration of the story of this opera may profitably precede a discussion of its origin and some of the vicissitudes through which it has passed. Mignon, the heroine of the tale, is a strange creature who in her infancy had been stolen from her home in Italy by a band of wandering Gypsies. By them she is brought up and compelled to earn her living by dancing. We meet with her first in the courtyard of a German inn, among whose guests are a troupe of actors who are on their way to the castle of a nobleman where their performances are to enliven a festival. In this company are Filina, an accomplished flirt, Lacrtes, a light-hearted servant of the tragic muse, and Frederick, a young gentleman dangling after the skirts of mistress Filina, with whom he is over head and ears in love. Another occupant of the inn is an aged harper, Lothario, whose words and acts indicate that a great sorrow has turned his mind awry. He is, indeed, an Italian nobleman who, crazed by the loss of his child and the death of her mother, is wandering about the earth as a minstrel seeking the daughter who, he is convinced, is still alive, though many years have passed since she was carried away by Gypsies. The actor-folk are making merry and have compelled Lothario to sit down to a cup of comfort with them, when a company of Romany mountebanks appear on the scene. Their dance is rewarded with applause and silver, whereupon the leader brings Mignon out of a cart, where she has been sleeping on the straw, and bids her perform the egg dance upon a carpet spread for her. The girl, angered by the laughter with which she is received, sullenly refuses, and the Gypsy leader is about to beat her when Lothario throws his arms about her in protection. The old man is thrust aside and the stick again raised over the head of Mignon, when Wilhelm enters the courtyard and rushes to defend her, threatening the life of her tormentor with a pistol. Giarno whines about his loss caused by the girl's disobedience, but Filina throws her purse to him and he takes himself off contented. Wilhelm, the newcomer, is a wealthy young gentleman, who, having finished his university studies, is seeing the world at his leisure. Filina has cast an auspicious and eager eye on him and now sends her friend Laertes to make his acquaintance, while she coyly retires within the inn, only to reappear when the men are in conversation and receive the homage of Wilhelm, already dazzled by her charms. The upshot of the matter is that Wilhelm, having nothing better to do, joins the theatrical company, accompanied by Mignon, whose release he had purchased from Giarno, and followed by the harper.

Arrived at the castle where the festivities are to take place, Wilhelm falls rapidly and deeply into the toils of Filina, to the unutterable grief of Mignon, who is now consumed with love for her deliverer. She notes the infatuation of Wilhelm, and in her jealous despair attempts to drown herself, but is restrained by the sound of Lothario's harp. To the minstrel she goes for help and comfort, but her imprecations against the castle inspire a wicked plan in the distraught mind of the old man. Actors and guests are in the midst of their rejoicings over the success of the theatrical entertainment when it is found that the castle is in flames;—the minstrel had fired it for Mignon's sake. The scene of confusion is increased by the discovery that Mignon, having been sent back for Filina's nosegays, is in the burning building. Wilhelm rushes in and brings out her unconscious form in his arms.

These are the incidents of the first two acts. In the third act we are transported to Italy. Lothario, himself unconscious of the fact, has brought Mignon to his ancestral palace in the land which had haunted her memory from childhood, but for which she has no name. It was to her only the land of golden oranges and burning roses, of blue skies and light-winged birds, of palaces peopled by marble statues—the land in which she wished to live, in which to die. Wilhelm, enlightened at last as to her love, has followed her, and Filina has followed him. He finds Mignon, and to Lothario confesses his purpose to purchase the palace for Mignon, who is now supremely happy in his love. Filina's coming almost gives her a death-blow, but Lothario's mental recovery, his recognition of the palace as his old home, deserted since he had set out on his wanderings in search of his child Sperata, and of Mignon as that child, bring all to a happy conclusion.

The incidents of this plot were drawn chiefly from episodes in Goethe's famous novel entitled "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre," which has been done into admirable English by Carlyle. In this work the story of Mignon is only of subordinate interest, serving effectively to supply a romantic atmosphere to portions of the story and bringing pure and ennobling influences into scenes singularly deficient in them, but touching none of the real springs of the romance. This, in effect, is an exhaustive commentary on social and political life in Germany at the end of the eighteenth century. In constructing a romantic play out of the Mignon incidents, the librettists proceeded very much as they had done in the case of "Faust," which they had turned into an opera-book for Gounod a few years before;—they took out the incidents which were adaptable to the operatic manner, utilized the poet's pictures and sentiments, but poured all the borrowed material into the conventional operatic mould, thus making it serviceable to the conventional operatic manner. For this both "Faust" and "Mignon" have been severely faulted by German critics, who, indeed, would not have been true in allegiance to the masterpieces of their greatest poet had they not resented their despoliation by librettists bent only on providing an agreeable entertainment for the habitués of the lyric theatre. But the philosophy of "Faust" and the critical comment of "Wilhelm Meister" are not fit operatic material, whereas some of the incidents and people of the two works are cut out for opera. This fact is strikingly illustrated in the present case. No more perfect prototype for an operatic character of the leggiera class than Filina could be imagined; and each of her companions supplies an individual element of contrast. Mignon is the embodiment of pathos, the exemplar of the cantabile style; Wilhelm stands for youthful sentiment—fluctuating and variable because youthful; Laertes for that careless disposition which has excellent expression in the conventional idioms of the buffo; Lothario is lyricism incarnate. The Mignon of Goethe is a tragic type, and her death, inevitable under the circumstances, is one of the most moving incidents in Goethe's romance. Mr. Thomas's opera, having been written for the Opéra-Comique of Paris, had to have a happy ending (tragic operas being at the time reserved for the Grand Opéra), and the circumstance that in it Mignon marries Wilhelm instead of dying of a broken heart gave great offence to the Germans, whom the composer attempted to appease with a new dénouement, a "Version allemande" in which Mignon falls dead in the arms of her lover when she hears the voice of Filina repeating some of the flourishes from her polacca in the second act. The device proved futile, as it deserved. The Mignon of Carré and Barbier bears little more than an external resemblance to the Mignon of Goethe, and to kill her is wanton cruelty. The operatic change has altered her nature quite as much as Gretchen's was altered, but the two characters are not necessarily rendered less amiable by that fact. In the case of Gretchen versus Marguerite, a strict moralist might even plead that the French librettists lifted Goethe's maiden to a higher ethical plane than she occupies in the original drama. Goethe's Gretchen, despite her sweet innocency, is of coarser fibre than the Marguerite of the opera. The authors of the libretto made the character more gentle, even while emptying it of most of its poetic contents; and Gounod refined it still more by breathing ecstasy into all its music. Goethe's Gretchen eagerly returns Faust's kiss on her first meeting with him in the garden, and already at the second (presumably) offers to leave her window open and accepts the sleeping potion for her mother; it is the sudden, uncontrollable rush of passion to which Gounod's Marguerite succumbs. Gretchen remains in simple amaze that such a fine gentleman as Faust should find aught to admire in her, even after she has received and returned his first kiss, but Marguerite is exalted, transfigured by the new feelings surging within her.

"Il m'aime! . . . quel trouble en mon . . . cœur!
L'oiseau chante . . . le vent murmure! . . .
Toutes les voix de la nature
Semblent me répéter en chœur:
Il t'aime!"

But this is getting to be something like critical discussion, which is not the business of this prefatory essay, and a sidewise excursion besides. It may have its value, however, in directing attention to some of the changes which the opera has undergone. It was brought forward at the Paris Opéra-Comique on November 17, 1866. Its success was instantaneous. Within six months it had one hundred performances, and before the year was over this number was increased to one hundred and fifty. Twenty years later the performances still averaged half a hundred a year in Paris. Its vogue, which was very considerable, in London and New York, was due to Madame Christine Nilsson, who sang it in London on July 5th, 1870, and in New York on November 22d, 1871. The latter performance took place at the Academy of Music, under the management of Maurice Strakosch, the language being Italian and the parts being distributed as follows:

Mignon, ...	Mme. Christine Nilsson.
Filina, ...	Mlle. Léon Duval.
Frederico, ...	Mlle. Ronconi.
Guglielmo, ...	M. Capoul.
Lotario, ...	M. Jamet.
Laerte, ...	M. Lyall.
Giarno, ...	Sig. Coletti.
Zingarella, ...	Mlle. Bellon.

The circumstance that the part of Frédéric, quite inconsequential originally, and played by a man, is in this cast assigned to a contralto, is an evidence of the changes that had taken place between the first Parisian and the New York productions. In London the part had been given to Madame Trebelli, for whom the rondo-gavotte, "In veder l'amata stanza" ("Me voici dans son boudoir"), was arranged from the entr'acte music preceding the second act, and since then has always been sung by a contralto. For Madame Volpini, who sang the part of Filina, also in London, a florid air, "Alerta, Filina!" ("Alerte, alerte!") was introduced, but these changes were trifling compared with the transformations which the finale underwent. The form in which it is presented in this edition is the first rearrangement of the original finale, and that followed universally now, so far as I have been able to learn. Lothario, reclothed in his right mind, sees his daughter Sperata in Mignon, because of the latter's recognition of the girdle which she wore as a child, her mother's portrait, and her recollection of the childish prayer which she used nightly to utter. The scene then comes to a conclusion with an ensemble, Mignon, Wilhelm and Lothario, rejoicing in the mutual understanding finally established, the musical foundation of which is the melody of the romance of the first act based on a paraphrase of Goethe's "Kennst du das Land" ("Connais-tu le pays" in the first act). Originally this scene was much more extended. Mignon and Wilhelm are happy in each other's arms when the voice of Filina floats in at the window. Mignon pleads with Wilhelm to drive the siren away, and the two withdraw from the threatened presence. The scene changes. We are in the midst of a group of peasants who are making merry. Filina is on hand, accompanied by the faithful swain, Frederick. She orders breakfast, and while it is preparing sings a song in the measure of a forlana—an Italian dance in sextuple time, particularly beloved of the Venetian gondoliers, beginning

Paysanne ou signora,
Choisissez qui vous plaira!
Tant qu'au ciel le jour luira,
En ce monde on aimera!

The sentiment is that of the song which Shakespeare admitted to his comedy "Much Ado About Nothing":

"Sigh no more, ladies, sigh no more,
Men were deceivers ever,
One foot in sea, and one on shore,
To one thing constant never.
Then sigh not so,
But let them go,
And be you blithe and bonny,
Converting all your sounds of woe
Into hey, nonny, nonny!"

The melody of this forlana, changed in rhythm, is yet to be heard in the coda of the overture. Mignon is shocked by the heartlessness of Filina, but the latter advances to her and offers her hand in friendship and congratulation and graciously bestows herself upon Frederick. Enter a chorus of peasants, who acclaim Lothario as their old master, the Marquis of Cypriani; and then general rejoicing. The nature of the finale constructed to humor the Pietät of the Germans, has already been suggested. It is abrupt enough to please the most voracious devourer of penny dreadfuls. It proceeds like the original ending up to the moment when the voice of Filina is heard in a phrase of the polacca, "Je suis Titania." Mignon pleads that she be driven away lest she herself die of grief. Wilhelm exclaims: "Mignon! Filina"; Lothario echoes with, "My daughter! Filina!" but Mignon, staring fixedly at the actress, falls into her lover's arms and expires.

Act II.

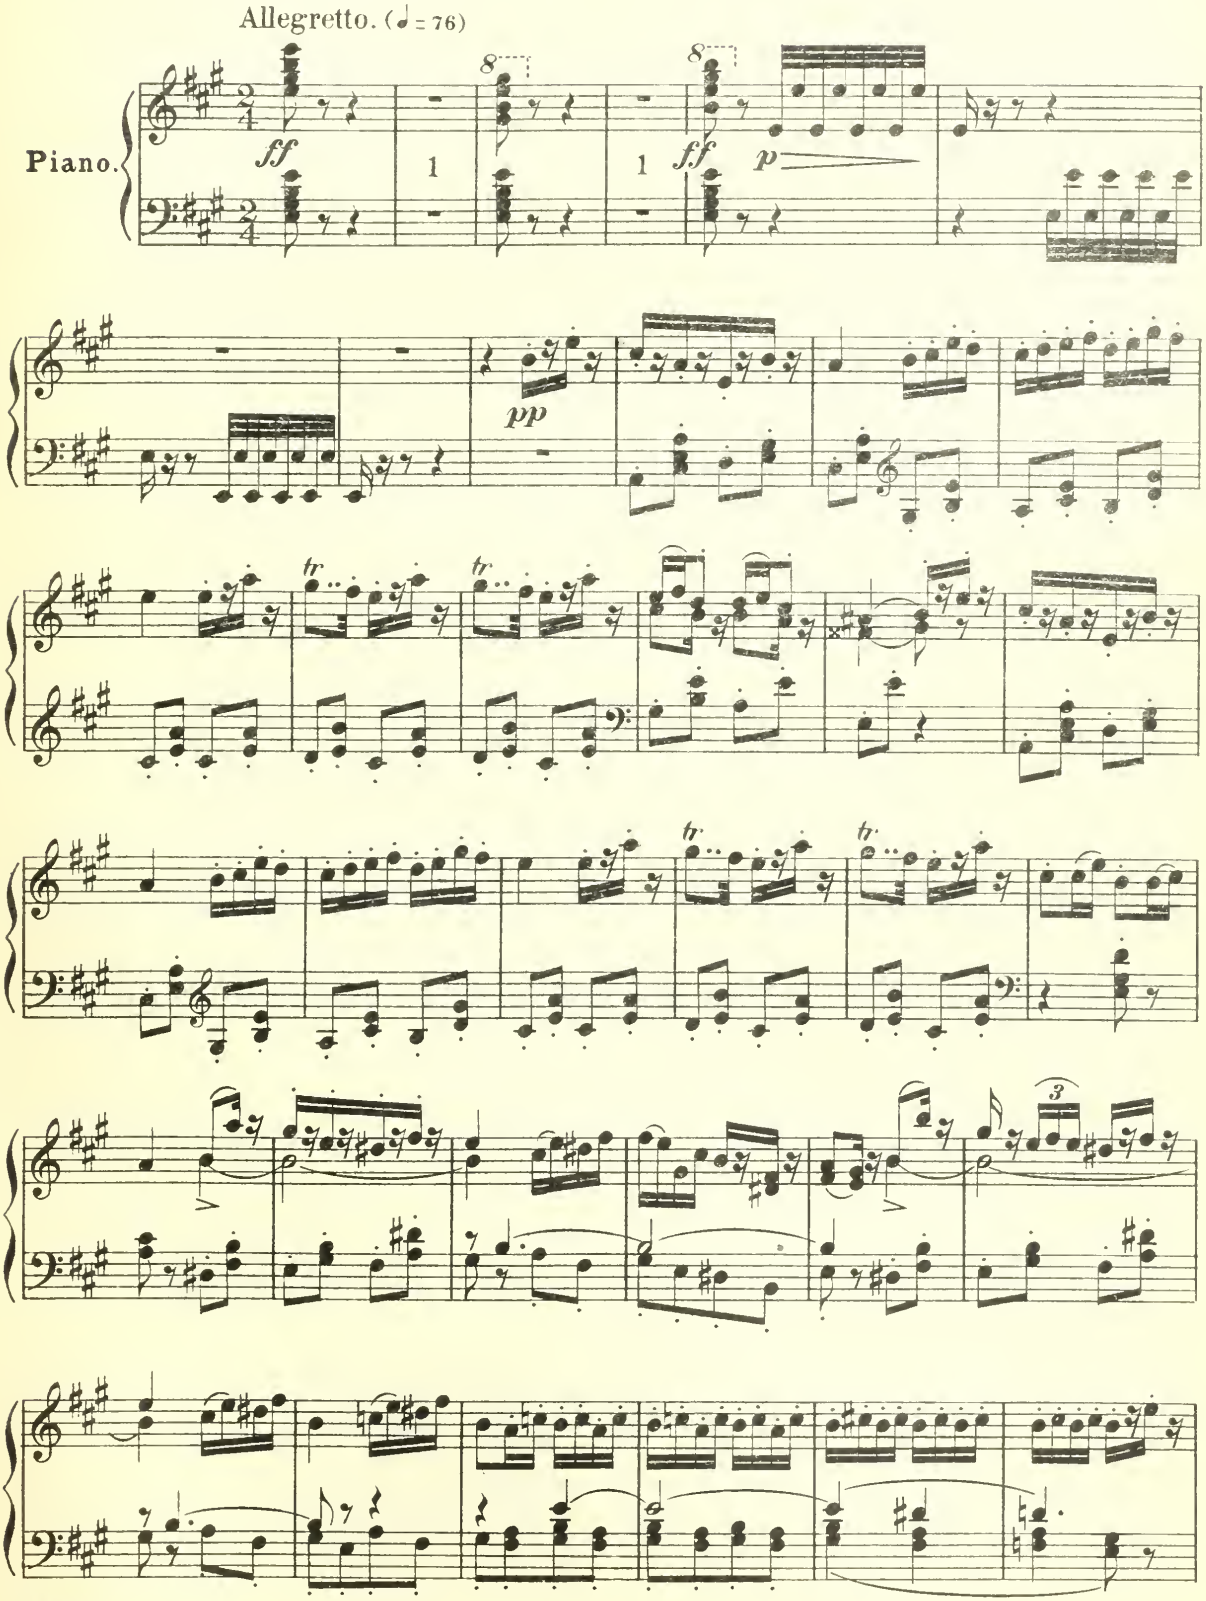
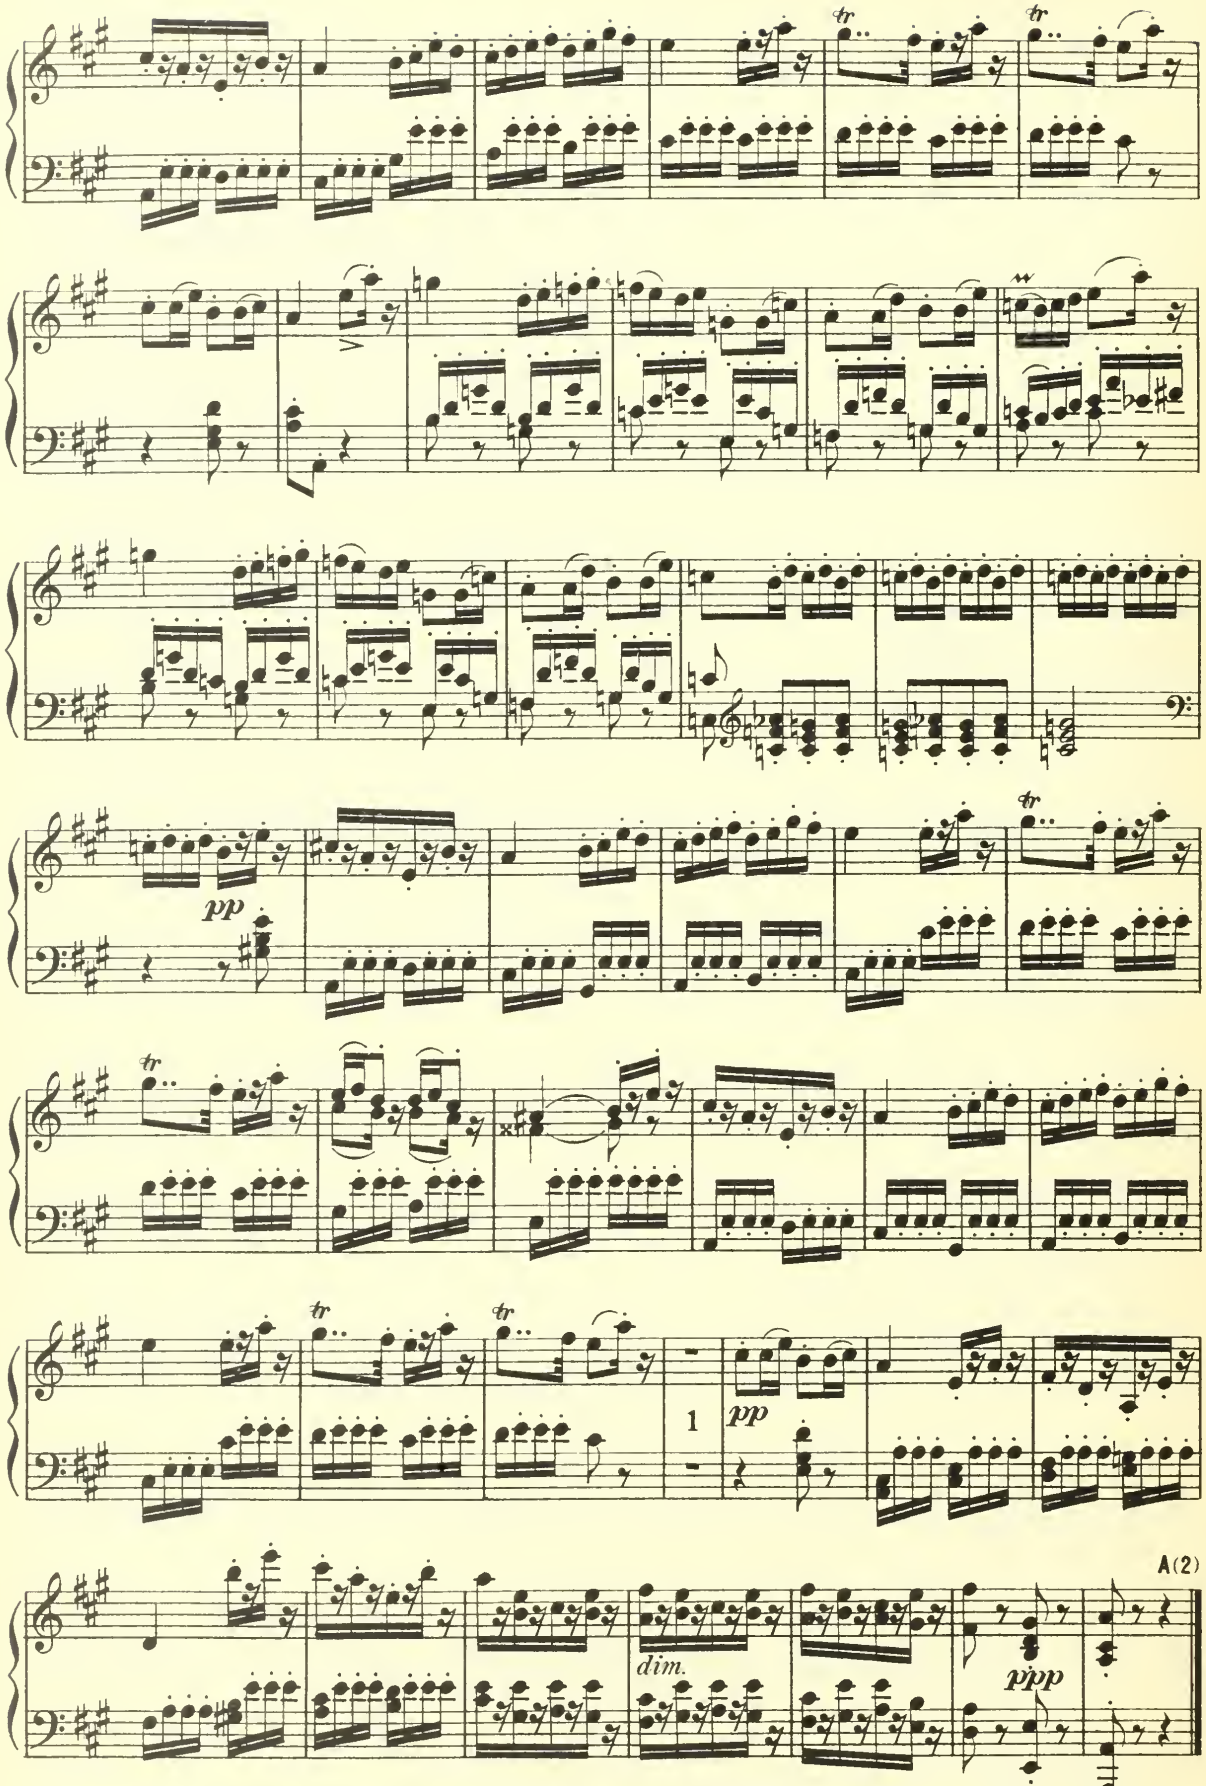
Nº 7. Recit.: "À merveille! J'en ris d'avance!"

Entr'acte.

1st Tableau. An elegant dressing-room; R. H., a window, L. H., a fireplace and mantel. Luxurious articles of toilet; sofas, easy-chairs, etc.





A(2) See at the end of this score, in the Supplement, the new air of Filina (ad lib.) sung by Mme. Volpini in London.

Filina (seated before her toilet-table, on which are letters and bouquets).

Allegro moderato.
